3 TIPS TO STOP REVENUE LEAKS IN YOUR PRIVATE PRACTICE
You’re not just running a private practice, you’re running a business. But running a private practice today is more than providing quality patient care.

It requires a plethora of administrative tasks that can quickly drain your bottom line if done incorrectly or inefficiently. In fact, the average practice has a 10 to 15 percent profit leak, according to Marc Lion, CEO of Lion & Company CPAs.¹

This guide walks you through common practice management holes that are leaking time and money from your practice, and the best tools you can use to improve operational efficiency and reduce redundancy. The end result is a proficient office, happier employees and patients, and a solid, healthy financial future.

Where does your practice leak revenue?

- Front office processes
- Claims denials
- Bad debt management

Identify your practice’s revenue leaks

From providing patient care to making sure cash is coming in, you’ve got a lot to manage. Without solid processes and tools in place, everyday tasks like billing and claims submissions may start to dry up your cash flow. The sooner you identify these problem areas, the sooner you’ll be able to identify where your practice is leaking revenue, and the sooner you’ll be able to find solutions and improve your revenue cycle. Here are three common culprits to look at first.

1. Front office processes:
   Your front office isn’t just the face of your private practice—it’s a vital access point to ensuring a complete and accurate revenue cycle. Your front office staff has the unique opportunity to verify patient information, demographics and balances, discuss billing options, and collect payments in a face-to-face interaction with your patients. Without an efficient process and the right EHR solution in place, your staff could miss this important window to address payment issues and prevent billing problems for your patients and your practice.

2. Claims denials:
   Accurate and timely claims processing and management is essential to your private practice’s profitability. Yet, rejected claims are all too common in the healthcare industry—the average medical practice has between 20 to 35% of their claims rejected, according to MGMA. Reworking a rejected claim doesn’t just take away valuable time from your office—it’s expensive! A rejected claim can add an additional 20 to 30% to the cost of that claim. Unfortunately, the situation is only expected to worsen. The Centers for Medicare and Medicaid Services predicts claim denial rates could skyrocket by 100 to 200% during the first year of coding with ICD-10. Ouch!

3. Bad debt management:
   One of the quickest ways to improve your practice’s cash flow is to reduce slow, partial or no payments—also known as bad debt. Bad debt is defined as dollars that could have been collected, but were not. Reducing bad debt by just 2% can mean tens of thousands of dollars to the bottom line of your practice. While some bad debt is uncontrollable, like if your patient files bankruptcy, there are things you can do to make it easy for your patients to pay your office for the services they received, which means more revenue to the bottom line.
